Having my head rubbed like a baby cured my stress: After her father died and she lost her job at a glossy magazine all in the same year, one woman tries craniosacral therapy

- Niki Browes' dad had been ill for several years with a rare brain disease
- Less than a month after her father died, her boyfriend proposed
- She then lost her job as an editor on a glossy magazine

You never really know what a new year has in store for you but, for me, 2016 will always be remembered for throwing a few right hooks.

It started on January 9 with an early-morning phone call. 'Did you get my message?' said my brother, Ben. Alarm bells rang immediately.

Our dad had been ill for several years with a rare brain disease called progressive supranuclear palsy and had been in a care home near to Ben's house. I'd been mentally bracing myself for this call for ages. But, I now know, nothing prepares you.

Less than a month after Dad died, my boyfriend proposed.

This was undoubtedly wonderful news and, having known each other since our teens, we decided we were well acquainted enough not to have to sit out a long engagement. So we set a date for just months later, not really taking into account that planning a wedding in such a short period of time can be, well, rather tiring.

Add to this relocation from one city to another (including researching schools for my seven-year-old son, Burt, from a previous relationship), and buying a new house.

We opted for a cottage that needed a major refurbishment — just because we hadn't got enough on our plates.

Then, in the midst of it all, a body blow — I lost my job as an editor on a glossy magazine.

The year isn't even over yet, but it's safe to say 2016 has thrown me some of the most stressful life events I've ever experienced.

I've tried very hard not to let it get me down but, I admit, I sometimes felt like a punch bag. It was the continual low-level anxiety — which manifested in tense head and neck aches even painkillers couldn't help — that made me decide something needed to be done; I needed to feel like 'me' again.

A friend mentioned she'd been having craniosacral therapy — George Clooney was an advocate! — and found it restorative, even healing.

An alternative medicine, craniosacral therapy — or crania, as it's sometimes known — is thought to relieve pain and tension by gentle manipulation of the skull, as well as other body parts, to realign the natural rhythm in the central nervous system.

At first, I poo-pooed this as new age nonsense. Wasn't this what I'd had done for my son as a baby? It was one of those 'must-do' neurotic mum fads (along with baby yoga) that we were all urged to do to make our babies sleep through the night.

Craniosacral manipulations on a five-month-old baby. An alternative medicine, craniosacral therapy — or cranio, as it's sometimes known — is thought to relieve pain and tension by gentle manipulation of the skull

At five days old, I'd taken him to a craniosacral specialist in Harley Street, desperate for some respite from his refusal to sleep. It didn't work for my son — I wasn't confident it would help de-stress an adult.

So it was with some reluctance that I went to see Elena de Antoni, a leading cranial practitioner at the Mandarin Oriental Spa in London.

She's devised a package called the Stillness Ritual, which is craniosacral therapy plus a separate massage. The idea behind the 50/50 combination — which is unusual, as you usually have cranio on its own — is that the two work hand-in-hand to restore the body holistically.

As the base of my spine was slightly twingy, I decided to pair my cranio with a back massage.

I arrived full of a nasty cold, so Elena recommended we work on the back area first, using a body oil made with eucalyptus and peppermint. She said I should leave the oil on all day, as both ingredients work as an anti-viral treatment. She gave me a gentle massage for an hour.

By then, I'd shed a layer of my tenseness and was intrigued to see how cranial could relax me further.

Elena lay her hands underneath my neck and held them there for several minutes. Next, she cupped my head, touching it gently and later asked me to lift up my pelvis, so she could hold her hands under my lower spine as I lay on her hands.

To say this treatment is subtle is an understatement. The only thing you feel are the practitioner’s hands. There is no massage. But I felt so relaxed that parts of my body began to twitch involuntarily, like when you’re on the verge of sleep.

I’d usually be embarrassed to find my body reacting like this in front of a stranger, but I was too blissed out to care. When the treatment was over I had many questions: primarily, had she moved her hands at all? If not, how could it have had an effect?

“I’d usually be embarrassed to find my body reacting like this in front of a stranger, but I was too blissed out to care”

Elena explained that the light contact of craniosacral treatment lets her feel the rhythmic motion throughout the body — ‘as though I can feel the body breathing’.

She can tune in via the gentle contact and address and release any disturbances and resistances, even if you the patient never knew they were there. This stimulates self-healing within the body. Intrigued, I wanted to know if she could feel anything when she was touching me.

She said that, at first, she felt a ‘weightiness’, which slowly evaporated. I admit it all sounds a bit woo-woo. But I felt a lightness I haven’t in months and as good as if I’d floated out of the spa.

I spoke to Beatrice Double, spokesperson for the Craniosacral Therapy Association, to find out why more adults are using what was once seen as a treatment mainly for babies. ‘I would put it down to modern-day stresses and hectic lifestyles meaning we burn ourselves out quickly,’ she explains. ‘We’re looking for more of a balance.

‘What’s interesting is how more and more people are drawn to therapies that treat the body as a whole and recognise the interconnectedness of body and emotions, for example, via the nervous system, which craniosacral therapy treats so well.’

I’m certainly a convert. I’ve had five treatments since, and the results have been as successful. At my last session, I challenged myself to try to keep my eyes open during a particularly relaxing part of the treatment, but I couldn’t. I was tranquil drunk.

With cranio, I feel as though I’ve found my inner boxing gloves. So, 2017, if you’ve got any nasty surprises waiting around the corner, bring ‘em on. Cranio has returned me to my emotional fighting weight.

The Stillness Ritual lasts an hour and 50 minutes. Sessions from £250. Contact The Spa at Mandarin Oriental London on 020 7838 9888 or email molon-spa@mohg.com

My daughter, as a youngster, had severe ADHD. The only thing that calmed her down was cranial osteopathy. It was fabulous to see a child with endless energy sitting calmly and relaxed - the effects lasted for several days :)

Sounds like an advert similar to those miracle diets - it tells you where to buy it, how much it costs and has one or two users who give glowing testimonials, yet totally ignores any scientific research and neither does it seek the opinion of independent clinicians.

The price quoted is atrocious but I can attest to its effectiveness. My newborn would take an hour to burp after feeding and also suffered with constipation. 3 visits to my local craniosacral osteopath and she was sorted. Might be TMI but baby filled her nappy whilst in the appointment each time too.... I was sceptical but became convinced after I had to ask my mum to take baby to her final appointment. Mum gets migraines but a the therapist offered to treat her there and then. Over 4 treatments (1 a month) the headache have reduced and finally disappeared altogether. . It's weird as they don't seem to be doing much but it definitely works his around 20 years ago, in fact, all osteopath's work is this. It works because they are slightly "massaging" the fluid around the brain. I watched pasty faced dull eyed babies of around 6 weeks going into my osteo and suddenly after 30 mins you would hear them gurgling and making other baby noises. I had similar and he worked on my head, my eyebrows and high on the cheek bones along with my sternum (where he hold our emotions). the first time I sat and asked him "was it good for you" lol. It was amazing. With my second oseto I could have gone to Mars and back, it could have been 3 minutes or 3 hours or 3 days. It was like an out of body experience. I am not one for fanciful notions and question everything especially when people say "we have always done it this way". WHY?
