Health Care as a State of Self-Defense

When she arrived, her face was so swollen she couldn't even tell what she looked like, and her breath seemed to come in ragged gasps. She had been in a car accident, and the doctors told her she had broken her nose, a few ribs, and a few other injuries. They said she needed to come in for a CT scan to see if there was any internal bleeding.

The following day, her face was recovering, but she was still in pain. She had been prescribed pain medication, but it didn't seem to be working as well as she had hoped. The doctors told her it would take time for her body to heal, and that she needed to take it easy.

Fortunately, her husband had brought her home, and she was able to rest and recover. She was grateful for his support, and they made sure to take it easy and not do anything too strenuous.

By the following week, her face had improved significantly, and she was able to start doing more things around the house. She was still in pain, but it was manageable, and she was grateful for the support of her family and friends.

In conclusion, the doctors told her that it would take time for her body to heal, and that she needed to take it easy and not do anything too strenuous. She was grateful for their care, and she was looking forward to the day when she would be fully recovered.
